STRATEGY VIEW

Crude prices are rising on tight supply and long-dated Treasury yields are at multi-decade highs, which pressures housing, airlines, trucking and rate-sensitive real estate while supporting energy producers. Technology as a whole is under pressure from a rising cost of capital, but infrastructure and application software are leading as AI is increasingly seen as a demand driver rather than a threat. The semiconductor picture is contested: memory and foundry fundamentals are strong on tight supply, yet chip stocks now trade on valuation and the rally depends on hyperscaler capex guidance. The book's largest software holding sits in the strongest part of tech. The two chip holdings are exposed to that contested semiconductor debate, and the four healthcare names have no strong news pressure in either direction. The growth family is at its cap and healthcare is full, so new capital will go into areas the book does not yet own, favoring cash-generative compounders over growth that depends on a spending cycle.
